

YOUR NUTRITION GAME PLAN

Eating On the Fast Track

Gotta eat, but don't have much time? Quick service restaurants, vending machines and convenience stores are a reality for many athletes. Is eating "fast food" a nutritional catastrophe?

No, it's possible to eat a balanced diet when "eating on the go," but it takes some planning. To find out if your diet is heading in the right direction on the fast track, take this quiz.

Give yourself 5 points for each statement you marked "true."

- 45 to 50 You have mastered eating on the go
- 30 to 40 You are avoiding major hazards
- 20 to 25 High risk for nutritional derailment
- < 20 Warning! Nutrition catastrophe!

In the world of nutrition nirvana, food choices would always be based on what's "good for us." In reality, research shows that most of us make food choices based on preference, cost and availability. In other words - tasty, affordable, convenient foods tend to be the mainstay of many diets.

But making food choices based only on these criteria can lead to "nutritionally challenged" diets. Making sure your body gets its share of the essential nutrients takes effort, but that's what athletes need to do. Your choices determine whether your diet stays in balance when eating on the fly.
